IT WAS A CLOSE encounter of the hoops kind.

Former Knicks player Baron Davis says he was “actually abducted by aliens.”

The basket-case baller told the hosts of “The Champs Podcast” that he crossed into his own personal twilight zone while driving through the desert “like two weeks ago.”

“I was, um, on my way from Vegas to here, to L.A.,” he said on the episode that aired Thursday.

“I’m a little tired and s--- and I

But this was no laughing matter, he claimed, even after podcast hosts Neal Brennan and Moshe Kasher pressed the 34-year-old into admitting he was telling a tall tale.

“Dude, they were poking me on my nose and s---,” Davis said.

Instead, the foul-mouthed Davis was stuck with “these f----- crazy-looking people” who were “half-human, half, like, f-----, ugly motherf-----.”

The UCLA standout and two-time NBA All-Star — who tore ligaments in his knee while playing for the Knicks against the Miami Heat in the 2012 playoffs — is also a first-class practical joker.

It was like four o’clock in the morning.”

The encounter ended, like most wild nights in California, with a pit stop at In-N-Out Burger.

“I just got off at the next exit,” said Davis, who earlier noted that he has been taking Percocet for pain related to knee surgery.

Two weeks after his extraterrestrial experience, Davis is still flying high.

“I come back and like, I’m sharper and s---. You know what I mean?” he asked the hosts. “I’m retaining information.”

His rep did not respond to a request for comment Friday.

But on the podcast, Davis said he has a book coming out about his alien experience.
